

Why Practice?

We've all heard that practice makes perfect and it really is true. Practice allows you to master the skills and internalize the knowledge you learn from your music educator. If you don't practice, each lesson becomes an expensive practice session. A lack of practicing shows a lack of commitment. Instructors say the same tiresome things because you cannot demonstrate the competence to proceed. This is frustrating for everyone! Both teachers and students can become burnt-out and disenchanted by this reoccurring tragedy.

Conversely, if you are practicing, enthusiasm remains elevated and each lesson can introduce new, exciting information and the motivation to keep progressing forward. Confidence soars when you conquer new techniques and add them to your toolbox. If you practice, you are more likely to remain a musician. Instrumentalists that practice set goals and achieve them. On the other hand, stagnant individuals can't foresee a future and get bored easily.

Private music teachers provide this individualized accountability that schoolteachers are often too overwhelmed to supply. Constant feedback, responsibility, and encouragement make playing an instrument fun! You can demonstrate your ability to someone who has your best interest and enjoyment in mind. He or she will focus on you and help to make you a better musician. Objectives are achieved under the guidance of a certified, professional, respectful, music educator.

Becky L. Long and Joshua E. Long own Art & Music Emporium and hold Bachelor of Science Degrees in art and music education from Penn State University.